NEW CANAL IS PREDICTED BY CAPT. SAWDERS

Speaker Tells Students New Trade Route Necessary In 30 Years.

Within the next thirty years there will be a new canal built in Nicaragua to take the place of the present Panama canal as the trade route between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, is the belief of Captain Sawders, an authority on Mexican life, as he expressed it in an illustrated lecture in the Majestic theatre this morning. An audience of more than 900 students from the college, academy and high school filled the theatre.

Captain Sawders spent some time last year in the Nicaraguan territory with the Marines now stationed there. He explained that the Marines are there merely for the protection of American interests and that they have no other justifiable reason for patrolling the country.

Still Seek Sandino
Practically all the fighting has been silenced by the Marines with the exception of the capture of the rebel leader, Sandino, who is gradually being cornered in the northern part of the country.

Chief among the American interests in Nicaragua is its treaty permitting it to dig a canal connecting the two oceans. At present this may not seem very important, but since recent investigations have found that the Panama canal can not be used after 1960, much value must be attached to another possible trade route. The course over which the proposed canal will take is 90 per cent water way, thus necessitating little actual digging as was the case of the present Panama canal.

Predicts Modern Methods
Nicaragua, as it was pictured in the slides and motion pictures, is a country of little activity as the climate and the conditions of nature make it unnecessary for the natives to do much work. Civilization has not advanced to a great degree, although with the importance of the country gradually increasing, more modern methods of living will soon be adopted.

Efforts of the officers toward locating a man, whom the girl said she hit on the head with a flashlight, have been futile.

Favorable Report of Fess Measure Revives Hope for White House Retreat Here

A Washington dispatch announcing that the Senate committee on public grounds and buildings had reported favorably on a bill offered by Senator Fess, Ohio, calling for the appointment of a commission to study the country White House situation, revived interest among members of the Mason Dixon Blue Ridge Association, seeking to have the summer home of future presidents in this area.

The Times learned this afternoon that the special committee of the executive committee of the Mason Dixon Blue Ridge association had received assurance that no action would be taken until the Senate committee members had an opportunity to discuss the summer retreat proposal with Mr. Hoover.

Scarcely had the president's recommendation reached the Capitol when the Senate committee was assembled and after a short meeting reported favorably on Senator Fess' bill, which had been introduced in the Senate December 17, 1928.

Fess Bill Outlined
Under the Fess bill, the commission would consist of the president, the vice president, the speaker of the house, the chairman and ranking minority members of the House and the Senate Public Buildings committees, architect of the Capitol, and the Director of Public Buildings and parks at Washington. It would report to Congress the site selected and estimates of the cost.

Gangsters Were Killed By Police Says Chicago Prohibition Administrator

Chief Of Police Declares Officers "Will Fight It Out To The Death With The Gunmen," Recent Daylight Hi-Jacking Cited As Example Of Connivance.

Chicago, Feb. 15 (AP).—Major Fred D. Sillway, assistant prohibition administrator, today advanced the theory that police officers themselves killed the seven gangsters shot to death in a north side gang stronghold yesterday and said he believed the names of the actual slayers would be known before night.

Commissioner of Police Russell who hurried to the scene of the slayings yesterday was quoted as saying: "This will be the end of gang war in Chicago. The police will fight it out to the death with the gunmen."

He ascribed most of the gang killings to the prohibition laws. Chief Russell said there were so many violators of the dry law that the resulting flow of money for illicit liquor set the gangsters crazy for money even to slaying each other.

Russell and Deputy Commissioner John Stege, in charge of the detective bureau, were at the inquest for the seven slain men at the time Sillway made his announcement.

Captain James Gleason, however, said it was ridiculous to suppose police were involved in the murders. A visored cap was picked up in the garage, he said, but it was that of a door man. Police he said would never have marched men out of the garage with their hands over their heads unarmed.

At the same time, the dealers expressed confidence that the attendance would increase daily. All seem satisfied with the interest being manifested by the patrons, who themselves are well-pleased with the display.

E. L. Weikert, who handles the Hudson-Exeter line, sold the first car at the show, closing a deal with Robert Kuhn, of Bendersville, Wednesday afternoon, when the machine was delivered. Arthur Phil, Durant dealer, sold a car to Archie Guise, Gardners.

The show patron, holding Number 352, will receive $2.50 in gold by presenting the stub at the show, that number having been drawn for the Thursday evening door prize. Foster Beard, Carlisle street, won the door prize on Wednesday evening.

DIRECTORS OF COUNTY SCHOOLS HEAR SPEAKERS

State Treasurer Is Commended For Prompt Distribution Of Money.

State Treasurer S. S. Lewis was commended for his prompt distribution of state appropriations to school directors in Adams county and elsewhere in a resolution unanimously adopted by the Adams County School Directors' association holding its thirty-eighth annual convention at the Gettysburg high school today. Between 150 and 160 directors, one of the largest crowds in recent years, were present.

The resolution, signed by D. C. Jacobs, Arendtsville, and Dr. Eugene Elgin, East Berlin, follows:

Resolution
Resolved, That the Adams county school directors in convention assembled commend Hon. S. S. Lewis, state treasurer, for his continued prompt dispersal of all appropriations."

Many of the directors were present for the opening high school exercises this morning, which preceded the opening of the convention at 9:30 o'clock. H. S. Reigle, McSherrystown, president of the association, presided.

Speakers during the forenoon were Dr. Charles H. Albright, Bloomsburg, and Dr. Frank H. Kramer, Gettysburg college. D. C. Jacobs and Philip Wagonman, the latter of Mt. Pleasant township, reported on the recent state convention.

One-Act Play
At 1:30 o'clock this afternoon, the directors were entertained with a one-act play, entitled "The Neighbors," presented by high school talent. Afterward speakers included Doctor Albert, Prof. George A. Stearns and Prof. J. Y. Shambaugh, the last two of the state department of public instruction.

More than 100 Adams county teachers attended a meeting at the high school, Thursday evening, when Doctor Albert discussed the time that should be devoted to various subjects in the grade school. His assertion that no arithmetic should be taught before the third or fourth grade created a mild sensation among the teachers as being radical to the present method of teaching that subject.

THE ADJUTANT'S DILEMMA

By DeWitt MacKenzie
(Copyright, 1929, Associated Press.)
For more than an hour the adjutant had sat at his desk in British general headquarters, "Somewhere in France," with reluctant pen poised over the findings of the court martial which had cashiered Captain Freddie.

It was the business of the adjutant, as representative of the high command, to pass final judgment, and he was having trouble. It was a most unusual circumstance for him to be stumped. He was adjutant because he was efficient.

Moreover, this was an open and shut case. On the face of it there was no earthly reason why he should have delayed even five minutes in putting his O. K. on the papers before him. And still the pen, from which ultimately must issue that fateful message, remained suspended in air, its point weaving little circles of indecision.

The adjutant finally threw his pen down in despair and walked over to the window. Before him was a lovely stretch of emerald countryside; off there somewhere

Robber Frustrated on Two Attempts to Enter Two Local Residences

North Stratton Street Residents Are Frightened When Intruder Tries To Unlock Door With Skeleton Key And Then Tries To Pry Open Window; Secure Description.

A medium-sized man, wearing a black overcoat and a light cap, made unsuccessful attempts to enter the homes of Alex Karas and Allen Barnes, North Stratton street, shortly after 11 o'clock, Thursday evening.

Mrs. Charles Kappes, North Stratton street, mother of Mrs. Karas, who was at the latter's home for the evening, had a good view of the would-be intruder as he stood in the back yard of the Karas home when she turned on a light on the back porch. When the back yard was flooded with light, the stranger ran out of the yard, going in the direction of the railroad.

At the Karas home, the man first tried to enter the place by using a skeleton key to open the lock on the back door, and returned after making an unsuccessful effort to open the front door at the Barnes home, next door. On his second appearance at the Karas home, the would-be intruder attempted to force a rear window, but found it locked.

Uses Skeleton Key

Mrs. Kappes saw the man in the yard before he made his unsuccessful attempts to break in. Frightened, she went to her own home, several doors away, to get Mr. Kappes, but he was not home, and she returned to her daughter's house. After she returned, she heard a noise at the back door as if someone was trying to insert a key in the lock, and later she heard a similar noise at the front door of the Barnes home.

When the would-be intruder returned to the Karas home and tried to pry open the rear window, Mrs. Kappes called "out Mr. Karas" name, thinking he might be trying to come in the back door. Receiving no reply, she went upstairs to her daughter, and told her of the noise. Mrs. Kappes screamed, and it is believed that the would-be intruder was scared away.

Neighbors Searched

The women then called for the state police, but the officers were not in the station. Shortly after midnight, however, Officer Paul B. Shearer went to the Karas home, and searched the neighborhood for strangers, but was unable to find anyone answering the description given by Mrs. Kappes.

A man, of the same general description, was seen in the yard of the home of Attorney William Hersh, Baltimore street, early Thursday morning, by Ralph Redding. Redding was about to go into the Hersh home to attend to the furnace, when the stranger accosted him and told him to leave. Rather than get into an altercation with the stranger, who had come over the fence from the yard behind the Knights of Columbus home, next to the Hersh residence, Redding left, returning later.

No attempt was made to force an entrance into the Hersh property, so far as could be learned, and when Redding returned, the stranger was gone.

NORDICS TRIM FIREMEN 46-26

Smoke-Eaters Wilt In Closing Minutes And Fast-Stepping Visitors Win Handily.

After battling Olson's Nordics on practically even terms for more than three-quarters of the game, the Gettysburg firemen weakened in the last eight minutes of play and the speedy passers from Coffeyville, Kansas, rolled up a large margin, winning 46-26 Thursday night in the Hotel Gettysburg annex.

The Nordics assumed the lead soon after Bream had scored a goal and foul for the smoke-eaters, Mills took the lead for the visitors and gave his team a 9-3 lead at quarter. The locals crawled up on the Nordics in the second round which ended 14-11 with the firemen trailing.

Mills, who scored 25 points during the 40 minutes of play, sent his team into a 24-14 lead in the third quarter. With the start of the last period, the firemen suddenly braced and crawled to within two points of knotting the count at 24 all when the Nordics opened with a brilliant, speedy attack that sent an avalanche of goals through the cords.

The visitors presented one of the fastest passing teams that has cavorted on a local floor in many days. The firemen put up a classy exhibition in the first three rounds but wilted in the last session. Mills was the big noise of the evening with 25 points, while big John Miller played one of his best games at guard.

The Inaugural Pageant WASHINGTON TO HOOVER

James Buchanan, 1857-'61 By Alexander R. George Washington (AP).—The only bachelor to be elected president, James Buchanan, Jackson Democrat and suave, courtly diplomatist, took office March 4, 1857, with the slavery issue and threats of secession rocking the ship of state.

Although Buchanan was not a popular idol and the clouds of political rancor and sectionalism dulled enthusiasm at his induction to the presidency, the inaugural parade was a military and patriotic pageant of considerable brilliance. In a car drawn by six horses was a woman dressed as the Goddess of Liberty and a flagpole 50 feet high. Another spectacular float was a fully rigged warship with sailors working high in the rigging.

Buchanan was the only son of Pennsylvania to be chosen head of the nation, and the Keystone club had a conspicuous place in the procession. George Washington Parke Custis, grandson of Martha Washington and adopted son of President Washington, was a guest at the ceremonies. He attended every inauguration from Washington to Buchanan.

The inaugural ball, held in a huge wooden building erected for the occasion, was a gala affair. The ceiling was white, studded with golden stars, the walls were hung with red, white and blue draperies, and the room was illuminated by many large chandeliers. A newspaper of the time tells of the "bountiful provisions" at the supper served in an apartment adjoining the ballroom.

Per wine and champagne alone $3,000 was spent; there were 1,200 quarts of ice cream, 500 quarts of chicken salad, 400 gallons of eggs, 60 saddles of mutton and 75 hams, 125 tongues and 500 quarts of jellies.

The mistress of the White House was Harriet Lane, daughter of the president's sister and of Elliot T. Lane, member of an old Virginia family. A society reporter of the day writes of her beauty and charm as follows: "The merry, bewitching Miss Lane—her cheeks glowing with the roses she loved, and her large, blue eyes beaming with amiability and

Warren is High Scorer of Maroon and White Cagers

A fast game is looked for on Saturday night, when Coach Eugene Martin's high school dribblers meet Tony Wilabach's William Penn high tossers in the high school gymnasium. This will mark the second meeting of these teams, the locals having gained a 39-27 victory over William Penn earlier in the season. The scrub teams of both schools engage in battle in the preliminary game.

William Penn will come here with a greatly improved aggregation. Coach Wilabach encountered much trouble in getting his team into a winning stride but since then his team has given all opponents a great deal of trouble. Rated as the best passing team in the league, the visitors are sure to give the Martinnians a real test.

Covers In Shape

A light workout was given the Maroons last night and another now, Coroner A. C. Bill said Thursday afternoon.

He intimated in lieu of explanation of withholding the letter that its contents might not be made known until the trial of T. A. Rice, intimate friend of the family, who was indicted for Jackson's murder after serving as a pallbearer at his funeral.

NOT PASSED

But war is war, and love doesn't enter into it very much. Men must fight, and women must stay at home and wait. Stern military law forbade the wife of any fighting man from joining him in the war zone, even in the back areas where it was quiet. The penalty for violation of this law was court-martial and disgrace for the man.

It was a funny sort of law, too, on analysis. For a soldier might make all the love he wished to any woman other than his wife. Wives only were barred. Of course, several million wives at the front would have presented something of a problem to G. H. Q. That was the military point of view, and the military viewpoint is notoriously lacking in sentiment.

Mrs. Captain Freddie didn't know much about military law. She only knew that she was awfully lonesome for Freddie. It was enough for her that she wanted to be with him, without worrying her pretty head about the "brass hats" at G. H. Q. And so one day she wangled a trip to the war zone, with the Red Crossers, or some similar workers. She headed straight for Freddie, and she found him in Amiens. He was the same old Freddie, too. It was good to see him.

But after the first greetings were over, an uneasy thought began to run through Captain Freddie's mind. He wasn't an officer in His Majesty's forces for nothing. He knew the law, and realized the danger of having his wife with him. He said nothing about his misgivings to his sweetheart, though. She was too happy. He couldn't spoil it all. So he sat tight, and showed his white teeth in the infectious laugh which had endeared him to the officers' mess and to his men. The adoring Mrs. Freddie loved that laugh, too.

They had a wonderful two or three days together, for Amiens, while full of troops, was fairly quiet, and they found good accommodations in a hotel. Finally Mrs. Freddie kissed her captain goodbye and packed off for London, happier than she had been in many long months of separation.

Then Captain Freddie faced the music. Arrest. Court martial. No possible defense that he could see. A sentence to be cashiered. And at last the papers had come up to G. H. Q. to the adjutant for the formality of signing. All this ran through the adjutant's mind as he stood disconsolate by the window, wasting time over a hopeless situation.

"Damn!" he muttered again as

BARN AT UNION BRIDGE DESTROYED BY FIRE

Frederick. — A large barn on the residence of Sterling E. Spurrier, near Union Bridge, burned about 11:30 o'clock, Wednesday morning, after an outbreak of fire of unknown origin.

In the barn were machinery and a large quantity of hay. Two fodder stacks and a straw rick also burned. The Union Bridge fire department was called and neighbors joined in fighting the fire, which was still in progress at 12:30 o'clock.

The loss was partially covered by insurance.

His fingers played their staccato roll on the glass. "And to think that had it been any other woman in the world besides his own wife, there would have been no charge against him."

Suddenly the adjutant's fingers halted their impatient drumming. And gradually a grin spread itself over his face. He hurried over to his desk and reached eagerly for the pen which he had thrown down so willingly a few moments before.

"This is going to be a bit tough on the little woman," he said to himself, "but it's got to be done."

Then he wrote his decision firmly across the papers, with a small flourish of pride showing at the end of each word.

"No evidence adduced to show that the lady in question was Captain Freddie's wife. Case quashed."

"CONQUEST"

BASED ON THE CAIDLE IN THE WIND
by MARY IMLAY TAYLOR

"CONQUEST," starring Monte Blue, is a Warner Bros. picturization of this novel.

SYNOPSIS
Arthur Faunce returns from an Antarctic expedition on which Simon Overton, the leader and Faunce's friend, was lost. Both men loved Diane Herford, but now Faunce proposes to her. Tortured by his memories, Faunce confesses to Dr. Gerry that in a panic of fear he left Overton, still alive, to die in a blizzard with no hope of rescue. A few moments after Diane's marriage to Faunce, a newspaper arrives with the story that Overton was rescued by English explorers and is now in London. Then Diane finds Faunce to be a restless, sensitive person. He goes to New York, arranging a new expedition, and Diane meets Overton.

A strange sensation, as if of personal guilt, overwhelmed her, and she shrank back with an involuntary feeling of panic. He did not observe it. He looked up, recognized her, and came forward with outstretched hands.

"Diane!"
She commanded herself with a supreme effort.
"It's—it's really you?"
He was holding her hands now, smiling down at her, deeply moved.
"Did you think me a spook?" he laughed unsteadily. "It does seem almost impossible. I've fair-

"It's really you!" she asked.

ly come back from the dead! Did you get my letter? I wrote you from London."

"No—no, I've had no letter. I could scarcely believe that you had come back!"

She was trembling; she saw the look in his eyes and knew that he loved her. And how wasted he was, how pale! Here was a man who had indeed been near to death. She fought for time.

"I had given up all hope long ago," she faltered. "The others were rescued; they believed you had been lost."

"I was as nearly dead as a man could be and live," he answered soberly. "I can feel the frozen horror of it now, the creeping drowsiness—can see that bleak, inexorable wilderness where I was deserted and left to die!"

He paused, as if the mere thought of it made utterance impossible, as if he had faced a crisis so terrible and so deathlike that it must remain forever unarticulate. "Left to die!" she repeated in a broken voice, feeling that the very earth sank beneath her feet. "Deserted! What can you mean?"

She was trying to be calm, but a nervous chill shook her from head to foot. He saw it; he caught her hands in his again.

"Diane, you care!" he breathed with deep emotion. "What does anything matter, then. I've come back and I've found you, my love, my love!"

She swayed and he caught her in his arms, holding her, his wasted face changed and lit with joy. "Don't!" she gasped in a low voice. "You've made a mistake—I'm married!"

There was a moment of intense silence. He straightened himself with a shudder, like a man who had been shot but could still keep on his feet.

"You're married? And your—your husband, Diane—who is he?"

She watched him. She felt as if life itself hung on the look that she would see in his eyes when she answered.

"Arthur Faunce," she murmured in a low voice.

"Faunce!"

It was a cry of horror, of dismay—she could not mistake that Overton stood still, a deep color flaming up in his face. He was apparently incapable of speech, but the look in his eyes, as they met hers, was a revelation. It showed neither anger nor jealousy, but only a deep and horrified consternation.

Unconsciously and unbidden, he turned back with her. They were silent. She could hear with extraordinary keenness every pebble that crunched under his feet, but she dared not look at him. She had a strange sensation of suffocating in the open air. A rending fear shook her, yet even at that supreme moment she had a rush of lucidity, a remembrance of every word that Faunce had said.

He had been with Overton when he died—that much had been clearly understood by all; and now, when they knew that Overton was not dead, but had been rescued by the gallant English sailors who had followed so closely on his track, what explanation remained, what defense for Faunce?

"Where I was deserted and left to die!"
Overton's words rang in Diane's ears. Suspense was intolerable; she must know the truth, even if the truth meant ruin. She forced herself to speak.

"You said just now that you were deserted and left to die. Please tell me what you mean!"

There was a perceptible pause before he answered.

"Did I say that? I"—he hesitated—"I've nearly forgotten what I said."

"But I haven't forgotten. How could I? Will you tell me?"

He shook his head.

"Not now—give me a little time to think, please. You must know that it's all confused—I've been so ill and delirious. You mustn't ask too much of a sick man's memory."

He ended lamely, trying to smile as he turned at last and faced her.

She met his eyes and felt the full power of their love and their renunciation. Their message was so clear that it made her feel faint.

They began to descend the steep path again. This time the pebbles tumbled ahead of them in a little shower as they scrambled down. Diane tried to talk casually, not looking at Overton again.

"How is it you're here, in this out-of-the-way place, so soon after your return?"

"My aunt, my mother's only sister, is living over there. She's nearly eighty, and she wanted to see me. I found her still in the black she'd worn for me for months. It's a strange thing to return from the dead! I needed rest, too, just for a day or so."

"You—look ill!"

He smiled.

"I've just pulled through; and yet it's strange, isn't it, the fever that possesses me to go back? The lure is on me. It draws men back, I suppose, to their doom!"

"It does—my husband is going again."

"So they told me in New York. I was there a few hours. Of course the newspapers besieged me, and I heard that much. Then I escaped. That's why I didn't hear of—of your marriage."

She winced.

"It was a quiet wedding; not much was said about it. My father has been ill."

He expressed his regret, and asked for the latest news of the judge's health. She colored deeply.

"We haven't written. It was agreed, when Arthur and I came up here, that no one should write to us. You see, he's been so much pursued about everything! I've been shut up here, out of the world, and I know nothing."

He turned quickly, and their eyes met with a shock of feeling. She knew intuitively that there was a reason why she had been kept in the dark, and that he fathomed it and was indignant for her.

They had reached a turn in the path. Near at hand, rising above some clustering evergreens, was the roof of the little cottage that Judge Herford had built for an occasional summer vacation.

"There the house," Diane said as lightly as she could. "Won't you come in and take a cup of tea?"

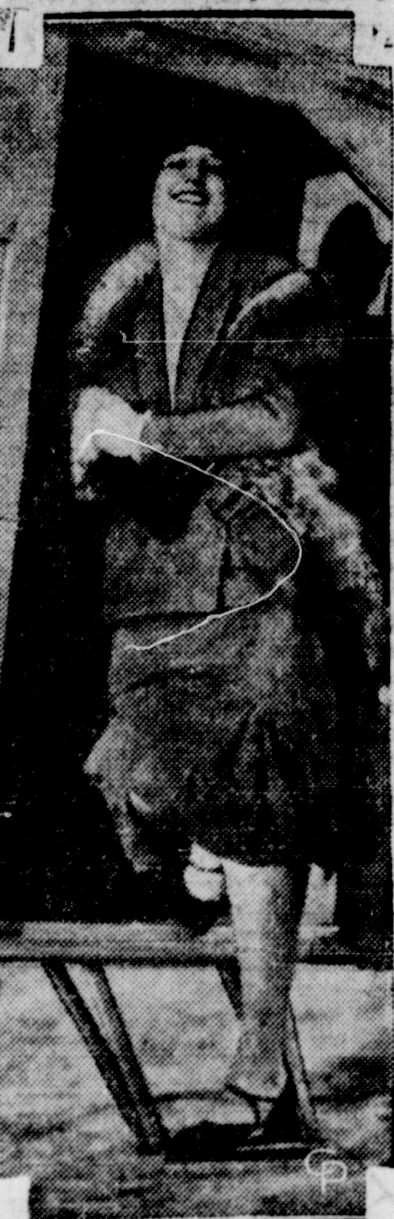

He hesitated; then, aware, perhaps, that the moment was an awkward one for both, he assented, and followed her down the last slope to the road. They crossed the little bit of lawn together, and Diane's mountain maid opened the door for them. While she and her mistress went to make tea for him, Overton entered the living-room.

On the table Overton saw an elaborate cigarette-case with the initials of Arthur Faunce, and on the mantel, almost under his hand, was a pipe that Faunce must have left there. Nearer, on a chair, were tossed a bit of Diane's needlework and her work-basket. They had been sitting there together by that fireplace, husband and wife, the woman whom Overton loved and the coward who had left him to perish in those awful wastes!

The touch of intimacy, of actuality, drove the naked reality home. Overton turned from the fireplace with a smothered groan and began to pace the room.

TODAY'S TALK

BY GEORGE MATTHEWS ADAMS

W. H. HUDSON
I AM asked so often about what books to read. It is difficult to suggest books that would be enjoyed by someone whose taste in reading you do not know. So I always have to be general in what I recommend.

But there is one writer who I offer without reservations when I suggest him—W. H. Hudson, the author of "Green Mansions," "The Purple Land," and a dozen or so books about birds. When this writer died, the world lost its best friend.

Hudson was the son of a New England couple who early went to Argentina to live. It was there that W. H. Hudson was born and his early life was lived upon the pampas. Here and there he wandered, gathering material that later made up his fascinating books on nature and wild life.

At the age of 28, Hudson left Buenos Aires for England where he spent the rest of his life, and where he toiled most of the time in obscurity and want. Not until he was broken in health and discouraged in spirit, did he finally gain sufficient fame and fortune to give him the comforts of life. But it was too late to give him the happiness he so much craved.

England has honored this great human spirit by memorials in several of her parks and public places. But posterity alone can adequately honor him by absorbing the love that he gave at so great a sacrifice, to the dumb beast and birds of the fields and wild. Hudson was a mysterious human being, though most lovable, and with a whimsical sense of humor that bursts out, like a little song, in so much that he has written, especially in his letters.

He made people feel the field or the particular bird that he talked about. His friend, Morley Roberts, once said: "With him a walk in the woods or by fertile hop-fields became a new thing.
The chattering jays took on brighter colors for me, the woods were more populous, since birds I thought alike he distinguished by notes I never could remember."

Hudson loved wild geese, and he never tired of watching, studying and communing with them.

A friend and biographical writer about Hudson, at his death, grieved at the usual burial of so remarkable a man in the ordinary soil of England. "I wished to take him out upon the open pampas, with a long wide view beyond the sight of man even on horseback, and with the great clear sky above. To have the wild winds sing about him and the wilder beasts crop herbage from his lonely grave, while birds trumpeted high choruses above one who loved them—that is the grave I would have chosen for him."

One of the loveliest memorials to Hudson is the bird sanctuary in Hyde Park, London, but no man ever left such memorials in the hearts of his friends, as did Hudson, as did Hudson, as did Hudson.
"I loved him," said Edward Garnett, "for his big nature. I took pure aesthetic delight in his character."

Mr. Dickson was graduated from North Carolina, where he became connected with the Champion Fiber

I'd go
And stop to gaze at tulips, row on row.
As does the boy, upon an errand sent,
Delay to watch a fire or accident Forgetting both his mission and its need,
So I, thought duty bound, should check my speed
And stop to hear the noisy whip-poorwills
And play the laggard among daffodils.

Though warned by life to look nor left nor right
I still should turn if roses were in sight, Forgetful of my mission, I should stay
Held by a sunset or a garden gay.
And should a wild thrush warble—
this I know,
I'd take his song and let the money go.

Now, where do you suppose the Magic Ahship took little Jack Rabbit one evening? Why, to Cuba, where the first thing he saw was a number of children with rude lanterns, and for light they had filled them with the wonderful fireflies of that strange land. As he looked more closely at the lanterns, he saw that each firefly was as large as a roach, with three eyes that shone like phosphorus.
"Goodness me!" exclaimed the surprised little bunny. "I have seen many strange things in Fairy Bunny Land, but never such wonderful lanterns."
"I keep many fireflies for pets, and often wear them in my hair as ornaments," cried a little Cuban girl.

Pretty soon the little rabbit hopped down to the seashore to watch the men catch the fish. And, would you believe it? The fish were as gaily colored as were the houses.
After that, he hopped into a part of the town where the poor people lived—in little huts, with mud floors and roofs of palm leaves.
These children played in the dust, among the pigs and cacti—a kind of peckly plant, you know—throwing stones at the hens and goats, which often walked right into the houses as though they belonged to them.

From there the bunny boy hopped on a little way to find many children at work; some sorting coffee beans and others filling great market baskets with fresh grass. Now and then the little negro girl children would stop working and begin a wild dance, and the little Spanish children a graceful one, while the negro boys beat on their drums.

By and by, as the little rabbit stood watching these strange sights, a procession came by. It was in honor of the patron saint of the small village, or "pueblo," as the Cubans say. It was the Procession of Maria. A little girl was riding in a cart, in front of which marched men clad as Indians, and behind it, men clad as Moors. And there was music, and they marched all about the village.

And when the day was almost spent, the convent bells began to ring, just as the sun was going down, and everyone stopped work and knelt to pray. And later, when the moon shone over the beautiful bay of Havana, the little rabbit heard a mother say to her child: "Come in out of the moonlight," for every Cuban mother believes that the moon twists the beast of the field and turns good fish into poison and makes the little children crooked faced. And in the next story you shall hear where the bunny boy went in his Magic Aeroplane.

Internal Health by Nature's Own Methods

If you are sick inside you are sick all over. When the stomach fails to digest its food, you are standing at the threshold of a series of ailments that may end in a complete physical wreck. Internal health means health throughout the body. Keep your stomach and other digestive organs clean and vigorous by giving them the natural stimulation of the roots, barks and herbs contained in Tanlac.

Tanlac is wonderful for indigestion and constipation—gas, pains, nausea, dizziness and headaches. It brings back lost appetite, helps you digest your food, and gain strength and weight.

Tanlac is as free from harmful drugs as the water you drink. It contains no mineral drugs; it is made of roots, barks and herbs, nature's own medicines for the sick. For over 10 years it has been recommended by druggists who have watched its marvelous results. The cost is less than 2 cents a dose. Get a bottle of Tanlac from your druggist, and give it a thorough trial. Your money back if it doesn't help you.

KILL THAT COLD Guard Against "Flu" and Pneumonia

Don't fool with a cold. Use tried and safe method to fight "flu" and colds.

Medical authorities have issued warnings against a recurrence of the recent "flu" epidemic, similar to the second wave which followed the terrible scourge of 1918. They advise everyone to take no chances with a common cold, no matter how trifling it may appear.

Do the right thing now—take a cupful of steaming hot Bulgarian Herb Tea twice a week during these danger months. It will assist nature to quickly break up colds, and will fortify your system against the "flu" peril. Bulgarian Herb Tea is recommended by druggists everywhere.—adv.

AFTER OPERATIONS

"I was three times under an operation and I was very weak and nervous and could not eat. I suffered for ten years. I learned about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and my husband bought me a bottle. I felt a little better and he bought me two more. I had the Compound in my home for two years and took it all the time. Now I feel strong and can do anything."—Mrs. A. Michalk, 5443 Mitchell Ave., Detroit, Michigan.
